I started drawing at very young age and never grew out of it.

Encouraged by my mother, who was an artist, drawing became a solid foundation in most of my creative adventures ~ putting ideas onto paper, building up the layers and seeing it develop.

Some of the 'rough raving renderings' have been refined into reality as murals, sculptures, mosaics and interpretive signage.

My first exhibition in 1978 was in watercolours, however successive solo shows throughout the 80's and 90's were in pencil, pen, pastel and brush drawings.

This early productive period as a fine artist was counter balanced by being employed as a full time corporate designer and again, drawing rough layouts for posters, advertisements, magazines and storyboards for TV ads was crucial to creating the finished art for production.

There are many, many distinct styles of drawing ~ my forte is 'expressive realism'. Also, there are quite different techniques as well and my students, across ages and institutions, have discovered disciplines that opens up new worlds and looking at things differently.

Personally, I guarantee that none of my future freehand work will be made redundant. AND what do Ai boffins do when the electricity grid fails, or batteries deplete, the internet breaks and computers crash????

I like the spontaneity and directness of drawing!
