The purpose of the assignment was "self portrait in the landscape" & the colours of outback Australia range from a light coppery brown to deep red-burgundy that perfectly matched the colour of my hair.

In the good old days when photos were taken with SLR cameras then the film was processed in the dark room ~ this is where I liked to stretch the limits with solarisation, superimposition and sepia effects before swishing the paper in the fixative tray.

Those were the days ~ such joy (((such labour intensity))) and holding your breath for the latent image to appear under the red light and lots of praying to the heavens above and yet it was captivating, creative and cool to experiment as the image emerges.

Today my library is accumulating a few 2 terabyte hard drives thanks to having an iPhone17promax ~ that is sooooo instantaneous ~ and great for documentation and dissemination AND doing the creative stuff sans holding your breath.

Each time I travel, I like to capture the essence of the trees, peoples, birds, landscapes or events… or just focus on singling out the details hidden away in obscurity.

Methinks photography is THE most accessible art form and it has always been my mission to make every image matter. The hardest task was selecting one photo that represents my work out of the tens of thousands in the fotolibrary. It encapsulates me to a T.
